CONSULTING

'Can our client e-mail independently?'

A website which allows you to independently build a network of friends and to refer to information sounds unremarkable. However, this is not the case for people who aside from a learning disability live with a severe visual impairment. For these individuals a standard web-browser and mail-programme are simply too complex. For this reason, Bartiméus in co-operation with the Ookjij Foundation has developed B-Link, a webtool specially adapted for these clients.

The website www.b-link.nl makes use of pictograms and audio-supported text to present information in an accessible format. Furthermore, users can independently e-mail with friends and family, listen to music and play games. The aims of B-Link are to provide and expand the social network of those living with combined sight loss and learning difficulties, and to enable them to communicate digitally with the 'outside world'. These possibilities improve their independence and participation in society. Within the education department, pupils are also actively engaged with B-Link.

A national community and accessible Internet

Bartiméus would like to work together with other organisations to provide a national community and accessible Internet for those with dual sight-loss and learning difficulties.
